

Tracing Social Justice: From Classical Ideas to Modern Redistribution

Ben Jackson – Mansfield College, University of Oxford

The concept of social justice has evolved significantly over time, shaped by changing social, political, and economic contexts. This historical perspective is crucial for philanthropy because it reveals how our understanding of justice directly influences resource allocation priorities. By recognizing the contextual nature of justice, philanthropic organizations can better align their work with contemporary needs rather than outdated frameworks. This research synthesizes existing literature on the conceptual history of social justice, examining both philosophical texts and historical developments to trace how the concept emerged and evolved over time.

What distinguishes modern social justice from earlier concepts of justice, and when did it emerge in political discourse?

Social justice is not a timeless concept but a dynamic construct that emerged in response to specific historical conditions. Its meaning continues to adapt to changing contexts, requiring philanthropic efforts to remain sensitive to evolving understandings of fairness and distribution within their particular social settings.

#SocialJustice #DistributiveJustice #GlobalPhilanthropy #StructuralInequality
#EquityDebates #ResourceAllocation #HistoricalPerspective

Background

&

Context

- Justice has ancient roots, but "social justice" is modern. While philosophers like Plato and Aristotle discussed justice broadly, the specific concept of social justice only entered political debate in the late 19th century, reflecting new concerns about economic inequality and the role of the state in addressing it.
- Social justice requires a defined community. Unlike abstract philosophical concepts, social justice presupposes a bounded society with determinate membership - typically the nation-state - where resources can be fairly distributed among recognized members. This boundedness shapes how philanthropic resources should be targeted.
- The concept emerged from specific historical conditions. Social justice gained prominence during industrialization when traditional social bonds were disrupted and economic inequality became more visible. This historical context reveals why certain issues (like economic redistribution) became central to social justice discourse.
- Social justice is inherently dynamic. Rather than representing timeless truths, conceptions of justice reflect the particular challenges and values of each era. This explains why philanthropic priorities shift over time, from charity, to empowerment, to systemic change.

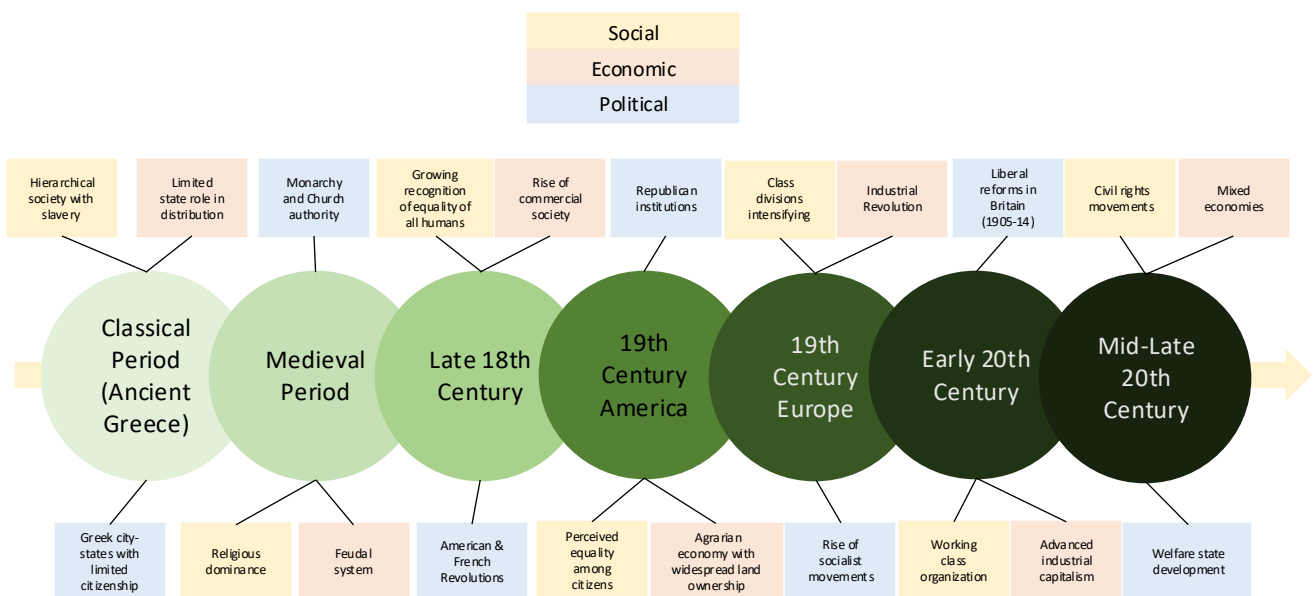

ERNOP Research Note

Academic articles on philanthropy through a practitioner lens

Take aways & Learnings

- Context shapes what counts as "just." The meaning of social justice varies across different historical periods and societies. Philanthropic organizations must therefore understand the specific context in which they operate, rather than applying universal formulas.
- Social justice is tied to resource distribution. At its core, social justice addresses how societies should distribute resources among competing needs. This makes it directly relevant to philanthropy's fundamental concern with resource allocation.
- The bounded nature of justice has practical implications. Because social justice typically operates within defined communities, such as nation-states, philanthropic efforts must consider both who belongs to the relevant community and how resources should be distributed within it.
- Historical perspective prevents conceptual confusion. By understanding the evolution of social justice, philanthropists can avoid conflating modern concerns with ancient concepts, thus leading to more historically informed and effective interventions.

A look at the social, economic and political factors that shaped the idea of "social justice" throughout history.

ERNOP Research Notes provide easy-to-read, practice-oriented summaries of academic articles on philanthropy and are written by practitioner experts. This ERNOP Research Note VII/2025 is published as part of a Special Issue on Justice Philanthropy in collaboration with PHILEA in June 2025 and has been written by Shreya Gautam from London Funders. More information can be found at www.ernop.eu.